THE FUNNEL

The planning concept behind this test fit is a funnel that is carefully oriented to guide users to a primary moment in the space - the kitchenette. With perimeter offices taking up the majority of the exterior walls, the kitchenette is strategically placed along a wall that has access to a key view for all users to enjoy. The funnel concept also allows a shift away from the long, straight corridors, and instead creates pockets of experiences along the circulation.

THE BUTTERFLY

This planning concept plays off of the shape of an abstracted butterfly, with the “body” running through the elevator lobby and weighted on either end by the reception and kitchenette, and the “wings” as the primary circulation through the space. The angles and curves of the circulation allow the open office to form around them, creating a softness in the space, as well as some interest in the circulation journey.

THE ANCHORS

The focus of this plan is the collaboration spaces, which act as “anchors” at the ends of the main circulation paths. With the collaboration spaces anchoring the space, it highlights these key moments, and provides easy access to all users, regardless of the location of their primary workstation. The kitchenette is placed to take advantage of the views that the space has to offer.
